[PROJECT NAME]

Call for participation

You are invited to participate in a research project exploring working lives and good work in [REGION]. The project runs until 2025 and is led by an independent research team based at Strathclyde Business School. Your employer has agreed you can volunteer to participate.

We would like to meet you for an in-person interview that would last no more than 30-45 minutes. We can offer you £15 in vouchers for your participation.

Participation: Voluntary & Anonymised

You might have been asked either by one of our team members or by your employer to participate.

- Participation in the project is voluntary.
- We guarantee complete anonymity of participants and organisations involved in the study.
- No findings will be directly attributable to an individual or organisation.

This procedure is part and parcel of the study approval we received for our project form the University of Strathclyde's Ethics Committee.

Summary of our Study

The study is informed by evidence that access to good work can reduce inequality and poverty, improve working lives, and provide better quality services. We also know that effective voice is central to good work and fairer societies. Good work is recognised as fundamental to wellbeing, a motivated workforce, and a strong economy. Good work has various dimensions including pay and benefits, representation and voice, work-life balance, and job design.

Ensuring more people have access to good work, and empowering the most vulnerable in society requires better evidence. Our overall objective is to capture the experiences of a diverse group of workers, to help improve policymaking and organisational practice for the benefits of workers, organisations and society.

What do we talk about?

We will ask you questions about your work. We want to hear your ideas, challenges, and concerns. Topics are related to your everyday tasks, and the way communication is organised at your workplace. There are no wrong answers.

Gathering diverse voices

We will be using a combination of methods to better understand the realities of working lives, including labour market analysis, interviews with various stakeholders, focus groups and surveys.
